C.I.A. STUDY HELD TO LIMIT CHANGES

Taylor Expected to Ask Only Curb on Military Role

By WALLACE CARROLL
Special to The New York Times
WASHINGTON, June 4 — President Kennedy is expected to receive a recommendation this week that the Central Intelligence Agency continue both its present intelligence functions and its undercover operations abroad.

Another recommendation, however, will seek to make sure that the agency is never again involved in a highly publicized "secret" military operation such as the unsuccessful attempt to invade Cuba in mid-April. When the President returns from Europe on Tuesday, a report will be ready for him on the Government's activities in these fields, together with recommendations about what should be done about them.

Aided by Attorney General, the report has been prepared by Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, former Army Chief of Staff. In making his study and recommendations, General Taylor had the help of the President's brother, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy.

The President called for a study of all the Government's secret and unorthodox activities after the failure of an attempt by a force of Cuban exiles to invade Cuba and overthrow the Castro Government. The Central Intelligence Agency was in charge of the training of the exiles and the planning and general direction of the invasion attempt. After the failure, the agency was widely accused of bungling.

Some of the critics, both in Congress and within the Executive Branch, also argued that no agency should collect and evaluate intelligence and also conduct secret operations. If it did so, the critics argued, the agency would be inclined to interpret its intelligence reports so as to justify its operations.

Although General Taylor's charge of training foreign recommendations have been tightly safeguarded, there is a general understanding among the military high officials that they follow these lines:

1. The Central Intelligence Agency should continue to be the Government's principal agency for collecting and evaluating political, economic, military and scientific information in the foreign field and disseminating it to the United States officials who need such information.

2. The agency should also continue to have responsibility for "covert operations" abroad. One such operation might be an effort to keep the Communists from gaining control of a foreign labor union. Another might be the giving of arms, money and advice to a political group that was trying to overthrow a Communist-supported government in a certain advice they might need when they went into action against forces backed by the Communist nations.

3. Paramilitary operations, however, that is activities on the side of the Cuban expedition, would be taken from the agency and put in a new special warfare unit in the Defense Department.

The report is also believed to recommend certain administrative changes to ensure the President and his advisers of closer policy control over the agency. And within the agency, the report is said to propose that the director be carried out to enable the director to exercise closer supervision over his agents all over the world.

During the Eisenhower Administration, the President's board of consultants on foreign intelligence activities disapproved of some of the administrative arrangements within the agency and recommended a number of changes.

Those suggestions were not acceptable, however, to Allen W. Dulles, the agency's director. Though President Eisenhower is understood to have agreed with his board's proposals, he thought that he could not force them on Mr. Dulles.

If President Kennedy accepts the Taylor recommendations, the agency will escape the drastic surgery that many of its officials expected after the failure in Cuba.

Before the President left for Europe, there were reports that he might break up the agency into smaller units and give its mammoth new headquarters, now nearing completion, to the Census Bureau.

All this now seems unlikely. The agency's staff is preparing to move in September from its present quarters in more than thirty buildings to the new home. This is at Langley on the Virginia side of the Potomac, about two miles west of the District of Columbia.

When this happens, the agency will be the only secret intelligence organization in the world situated on a four-lane highway with large signs pointing the way to its doors.

The new building has been one of Mr. Dulles' favorite projects. He persisted in building it despite objections by some of his associates that it was too big and conspicuous for a secret organization.

Mr. Dulles is now 67 years old. It is believed that once the agency is installed in its new quarters he may retire.

Established in 1947

The Central Intelligence Agency was set up by law in 1947 to conduct those secret activities that all the great powers engage in but seldom acknowledge.

It works under the direction of the National Security Council, the President's highest advisory body on foreign policy and defense. The size of its budget and staff is secret, but it is generally assumed to spend more than half a billion dollars a year. Its new building is presently estimated for 10,000 employees.

United States ambassadors and other officials abroad have sometimes accused the agency of oversteering its foreign activities.

Recently, some of the new ambassadors appointed by President Kennedy, notably Dr. J. Kenneth Galbraith in India, have insisted that the agency must refrain from any activities that would embarrass the United States in its relations with the countries they are serving.

As a secret organization, the agency has a policy of not doing anything in public against charges of bungling. Privately, however, it has been given credit for a number of successes.

In the intelligence field, the agency is said to have warned President Eisenhower of the Israeli, British and French attacks on Egypt in 1956.

In the field of covert operations, the agency is understood to have had a hand in the overthrow of Mohammed Mossadegh, the anti-Western Premier of Iran, in August, 1953.

The following year it played a major part in the overthrow of the Arben Government in Guatemala, a Government that was regarded in Washington as Communist-dominated.

Some like it hot (most don't).

And Ohrbach's Men's Shop has all the clothing you'll need to keep cool this summer. Seersucker jackets with slacks are this season's hottest combination for staying cool. Get a jacket and two or three pairs of slacks, and your co-workers will think you're wearing a new outfit every time. Or a poplin or cord wash 'n' wear suit can be worn so often they'll think you've got four suits instead of only one. Keep your feet in step with the season, too, in cool summer shoes. Don't spend the summer yearning for cool weather. You can outwit the heat in cool clothes from Ohrbach's air-conditioned Men's Shop, New York and Newark.
